Richard finally arrived at the front door. He yanked hard on the door. He was freezing, literally. It was locked! What was going on now He yanked hard again, it was locked! Stepping away from the door he saw the sign, Merry Christmas; closed for the Holidays. He could not believe this! Their sign said open 365 days a year. He had made sure of that last night. What did they mean closing for Christmas He was desperate; he ran to the front window and pressed his face against the glass, cupping his hands around his face to see inside. It was dark; it was closed. Damn them! He could see the gun sitting silently in the window waiting for him. He ran back to the door. He kicked the door over and over, screaming at it. Richard screamed at the top of his lungs. He was frozen stiff, every kick hurt his foot. He thought it might just break from the stiffness the cold had caused. He beat on the door with his fists; he kicked and kicked and screamed and cursed. Finally, in utter frustration, he grabbed both door handles and shook them like a gorilla, screaming at the top of his lungs. Damn you, damn you, your sign says you are open 365 days a year! Damn you to hell! He was clearly enraged and desperate. The Silver Cloud was parked across the street, engine running and windows up. Still, the occupants could clearly hear the mans ranting. Ricardo, wait here; I am going to see what has caused such anguish in this mans life. Sir, let me go; you dont belong on these streets....
