Another caution highly necessary for such persons is, to put on their clothes immediately on their leaving off work, and to do this without any regard to the warmth of the weather. Nothings can be more hazardous than for a person who is heated with labour, and in a strong perspiration, to remain exposed to the wind. The exhalation both from the body and the wet linen, produces a sudden and considerable degree of cold, which is not merely transient, but continues as long as the moisture is suffered to exhale freely into the open air. I have before remarked the hazard of labouring persons sleeping on the ground during the intervals of their work. This is improper at all times, but particularly dangerous if the ground be any wise moist. Indeed I am of opinion that sleep had better be avoided altogether at such times; as such slumbers produce but little refreshment, and expose the health to unnecessary risque. The body would be sufficiently rested by the cessation of labour, and early hours in the evening would afford a sufficient portion of time to be spent in sleep. Moisture is equally necessary to be considered in this place, with respect to its effects on the health, as heat and cold. This, I have before observed, cannot be always avoided, but the bad effects it sometimes produces may generally be obviated. If those who are wet with showers, would be careful to...
